

Offline

Those times when going online was an actual activity are gone, probably forever. We don't go online anymore - we are online. Talking to our friends basically has morphed into sharing with our friends. What are you listening? Spotify links. Where are you now? Location sharing. You see a funny looking pigeon? Click and send. That's why the format of our film is in this specific size - it represents the way we share information with each other. This constant information sharing remains even when we rush to meet with each other - and that's the point where we should draw the line. Being connected to each other boundlessly online and making actual connection personally together brings the perfect balance that a young adult should find in their human relationships.

Until the very first second of our personal meetings - we can stay in touch online. Where are we, what are we seeing, which direction are we coming from - real time online conversations mere seconds before the real conversations. This video depicts an ordinary online discussion between two friends approaching each other and the only thing that should be visible when they are together: their little green dot disappearing.

However GenZ people spend more time on their phones as the time goes by, in the meantime they have learnt to value their precious time spent together. Eye-to-eye communication and the personal touches have been upvalued and appreciated nowadays, where our attention focuses mainly for a long rectangular object in our hands. As going offline is not maintainable every day, balancing between disconnection when you try to connect with each other has been more and more important.

Yettel.